Savage Shadow: The Search for the Australian Cougar David O'Reilly

For decades farmers in the southwest of Australia have been convinced that there are cougars at large in the Australian bush, devastating wildlife and livestock. Hundreds of sightings have been documented in Western Australia, from as far north as Geraldton, south to Esperance and inland to Norseman. Australian journalist David O'Reilly became fascinated with what is known as perhaps Australia's greatest wildlife mystery during his time as the bureau chief of The Australian's Perth office. He interviewed scores of witnesses - farmers, wildlife experts, academics and bureaucrats - and wrote many stories about the hunt for the 'Cordering Cougar', as it became known, during the late 1970s and early 1980s. This book, now back in print for the first time in 30 years, is the culmination of that work. "A classic, timeless work back in print at last." - Dr Karl Shuker, zoologist and author "One of the most influential books on the subject [of Australian Big Cats] is David O'Reilly's 1981 Savage Shadow: the Search for the Australian Cougar (recently republished by Strange Nation Publishing). O'Reilly's book mostly centres around the experiences of those who claimed to have seen (or experienced the depredations of) the 'Cordering Cougar' in West Australia during the 1970s." - Dr Darren Naish, author of Scientific American blog Tetrapod Zoology
