In this breakthrough book, internationally respected literacy researchers Gay Pinnell and Pat Scharer introduce us to community writing, which centers on the relationship between group writing such as shared and interactive writing and children's own independent writing development. At the heart of community writing is rich talk about all aspects of the writing process as well as several other key essentials the book shows you how to develop:

- How to help your young writers “own” their topics; children write best when their writing is based on authentic topics of their choice—ideas, stories, and events that are real for them.
- How to use quality children's literature to support your teaching; the authors demonstrate the importance of reading quality books to children in ways that invite children's thoughts, questions, and observations before, during, and after the reading. Conversations about books help children learn about the writer's craft.
- How to teach writing all day long—beyond the writer's workshop; children learn about writing in a range of instructional contexts each day. For use with Grades K-3.
